I am writing to apply for the MSc in Clinical Embryology at Oxford University starting in October 2021.

I aim to become a reproductive physician and offer the best possible support to both women and men in their endeavour of having a child.

Currently, I am studying medicine (state examination) in Munich, Germany. This programme offers a broad overview of human medicine and imparts thorough insight into the human body, its functions and dysfunctions as well as analysis and treatment. Having successfully finished these studies, I would like to broaden my knowledge in the areas of human reproductive biology, embryology, infertility and assisted reproductive technology specifically.

I was confronted with the issues women—and men—face when wanting to have a child and give birth to a healthy baby early and more than once in my life. Before I turned six years old, my mother had a miscarriage that, as it turned out subsequently, could most likely have been prevented had she been treated by a doctor specialised in reproductive medicine. Fifteen years later, I accompanied a close friend of mine during her long journey of wanting to start a family. It took four years until she could hold her own child in her arms. Ever since then, my career aspiration, which I had already had in mind before, has been definite.

Early on in my medical studies, I started focusing on human reproductive biology as much as this general study programme allowed it. I participated in projects revolving around issues in this area, and I volunteered in a programme aimed at mentally supporting women and men that currently go through artificial fertilisation. My final paper will deal with this topic as well, as my supervisor specialises in this field of research.

Before successfully finishing my studies in Germany, I decided to take a gap year in order to determine how exactly I would be able to achieve my professional goals. During my sabbatical year, which I spent in India, the United States of America and Malaysia, among others, I found how versatile and incomparable the various cultures in the world are. However, there is something that unites them all: the love for their children. For most people, family, above all, is the most important aspect of life. Having biological children is a wish of billions of women and men worldwide—but not all of them are able to fulfil themselves this wish. Some of them need help.

My goal is to help these women and men, and I am convinced that the MSc in Clinical Embryology would enable me to do so. For this reason, I am hoping to become one of the students enrolled in the 2021 cohort of Clinical Embryology at Oxford University.
